Ar the Magistracy this morning, Loung U was committed for trial at the Oriminal Sessions by Mr H. E. Wodshouse, on a charge of committing a robbery on the Quarry Bay Road. It appeared from the evidence that the wife of a Wanchai milkman went down to Quarry Bay yesterday to collect money, and on her way back was stopped by the second and another man not in custody and was roobed of $72 and some jewellery. The woman was first assaulted and had perper rubbed intoher eyes. Her two fokis errived on the scope as the men were disappearing up the hillwas given, and the sucused captured. centuries. That the French doctors have done more than the other nationalities as vet in investigating this poculiar form of pest, but the 'contagionists' and the 'nonto science.

That the only thing upon which all scientists are agreed is, that filth, poor living, remain in the boat until to-morrow mornand overcrowding are the feeders, if not the originators, of the pestilence.

That the efforts of the Sanitary authorities to fight the Filth Fiend are, therefore, entirely in accordance with common sense and experience, as well as scientific principles.

That the zeal which animates every rightthinking member of the community takes different ways of expression, and while you find one man quistly advocating one mode of stamping out, you discover another fuming at everybody who dates to waste time in making suggestions.

That fire, water, fumigation, disinfectants, and cleaneing of all descriptions have been suggested; and the Sanitary Authorities have all the time to go on dealing with the fact of the Plague, the treatment, and the burials.

That one can fairly well understand the feeling of irritation produced upon certain members of the Permanent Committee when reasonable suggestions are quietly and persistently advanced; but it ought to be borne in mind that the general wolfare is simed at by everyone, and petty considerations of temper should be buried in the uttermost depths of the sea.

That the members of the Permanent Committee of the Sanitary Board have done. is commending itself to the quiet onlooker. more than anything else.

That Mr May is a man amongst men in a emergency is beginning to be realised by the people of Hongkong. That it is not my intention here to discuss further the causes of the Plague, or the best means to stamp it out, for my study that what mankind do not know about its causes, its modes of transmission, and its treatment, would fill much more bulky volumes than already exist on the sub-

That I do not sympathise with the denunciation of the General Commanding in the course he has adopted in lending the military to aid in stamping out the disease. That 'it was unfortunate a better understanding was not arrived at earlier for the more liberal treatment of the soldierly search-parties at the beginning -a mistake · which is now being remedied. That the fear of interfering with constituted authority and official regulations has prevented private liberality from coming forward and taking substantial shape; but I feel sure that the soldiers who have lent their services for this work will not be forgotten by those who take an interest in the welfare of the Colony. That there is no doubt a testimonial to the like wild-fire, and I fancy there need be no fear of 'official regulations.'

That, without seeking to force any dogmatio opinions upon the Sanitary Authorities, I cannot but think the idea of cleansing fires is one which should commend itself to those who are striving to drive out the poison from our midst.

That disinfecting is one wholesome means. and fire-purifying is another; and therefore I say try them all, if possible. That I do not mean an indiscriminate use of fire which might become dangerous. or prove an anxiety to the Fire Insurance Societies of the Colony.

That sulphur-chatties in the houses or horels, and clear-burning bontires in the streets of the infected districts, could be far as we could learn at five o'clock. carefully watched by those persons ongaged in the cleansing operations.

That it may be a small matter when com pared with the main question of suppresnion, to refer to the mistake made by the Government in transferring their responsibility to the Chinese Haspital.

That A as I said at the time, it mattered very little in itself, for the treatment of the disease is a comparatively open question, and may not be taken as a fair criterion of the advantages of Western over native ideas.

That any one who reads the proclamation issued by the Magistrates of Nam Ho and Pon-yu will egree that the danger inquired by any form of concession has been misinterpreted as a 'give away' by the Hongkong Government to the officials

That the idea conveyed is very nearly that glad to give such information as is in my an obedient vassal has deemed it advisable power to assist your report as regard my to concede the demand of the Imperial men. Yours truly, will, and done what he was asked to do.

That the danger of concession, even in a municipal matter like the present, is, that if is at once classed by the Chinese under the Celestial assumption of superiority. and the whole idea of the arrangement is thrus twisted and contested into a shape that was never contemplated.

That diplomacy of this kind will always be at homest intercourse.

Hongkong, June 2. SIR,-There can be very little doubt bu that the alarming increase of the plague is principally due to the measures which have been taken with the idea of insuring its suppression, viz. the stirring up of filth, the accumulation of years, before first tak ing the precaution of having that filth properly disinfected.

If we look into the history of the plague since its commencement we find that, when the house-to-house visitation only was taking place, returns showed that the cases were decreasing, and we began to think we had the upper hand of our enemy, but it is impossible to dispute the fact that with the greater activity shown in digging out the muck there was, I may may naturally, a corresponding spread of the epidemic. MA RUSSIAN ACCOUNT OF THE VEDDAS IN CEYLON. Ernst Hekkel has contributed to the Deutsche Rundschau an enthusiastic account of a new triumph in Anthropology. It deals with the discovery of the tribe of Veddas in Ceylon. The discovery was them, and the same may be said about, made by the two Swiss brothers Sarazen, who carefully observed the ways of life of these pigmies, whom they consider the connecting link between animals and men. The Sarazens have recorded the results of their study in the book 'The Veddas' in Caylon. Hekkel attaches greatimportance to the peculiarities of the Veddas. Moreover, the manuers of this strange race of people, as described to us, are very interestng. The Veddes are a completely distinct tribe, and are not only one of the most ancient but one of the most closely connected to the monkey race. In the construction of their body, and more particularly in constitution, they have very close affinity with the Chimpanzee. In short, they are the best preserved specimens of the curly-haired people (' Eupochlaneth or boat responded, but wasstaved against the ship's gives papers on Trade, Commerce, and Cymotricheus'). This race of black years before Buddhs. Besides the Veddas, but far more developed and civilized, arethe Dravidians, who, although they are of common origin with the former, have become much changed by intermarriage with the Aryan races and the Cingalese, but the last named are of much later extraction. . According to the theory of some scholars, the Veddas are no other than a degenerate race, sprung from the Ancient Indian 'Paris.' Hekkel is quite of a different opinion. Certain historians—as, for example, Pelladine (Palladian?), -of the 4th century allude to the Veddas and give a description of their life strikingly similar to the life they lead at the present time. Then, as now, they lived almost entirely in caves and forests. So in the "Mahayanso,' the most important Cingalese schronicles, we find details concerning the race 'Iyaka' as like as two drops of water to the Veddas. It is interesting, too, to note that, in the Sanskrit poem 'Remayana,' the Indian Hisd, the expression Monkey' is made | medical man who exemined me gave me some use of when the 'Ivaka' are mentioned. We may add that a Dutchman (Gaffner), who chanced to be in Ceylon about the year 1830, has left a most interesting descripslightest good. The lidney secretion was sometion of the Veddas. Gaffner, it would seem, was greatly allured by the charms of and bile. the picturesque existence led by this most primitive of people. The brothers Sarazen paint it in somewhat different colours. First of all, let us remark, that at the present time the number of Voidas in Caylon does not exceed 2,200, although resembled white clay. Another attack came on, they inhabit a vast extent of territory be, and as I was daily getting worse, I said, 'I will tween 7deg: and 9deg. latitude and 81deg. | see the doctor first, and if he can do me no good, · to 82deg. longitude. They live there, isolated from one another, each family hunts in its own part of the forest only. In the rainy months (October, November, December the Veddse come more together. At that 'I will try a botile.' period their forests become inundated with water, and they seek refuge on the rocks, where they meet their neighbours. Whole families have then to herd together in large caverns, and among the Yeddas, who are thus so closely thrown together, a sort of common wealth is established. Marriages are arranged, and they consult each other about their affairs. It should be observed they have no rulers, they know no laws, and have not the least comprehension of effect. such a thing. It has been remarked above that the Veddes bear very close relation to Chimpanzees. They are unacquainted with beds; and at night they lie down without anything on, on the wet ground, and use no coverlets of any description. They do not care for ornaments. Neither men, women, nor children see the necessity of appearing more beautiful than they are by nature, or trying to attract attention by putting on coquettish finemen Their household utensils are conspicuous by their absence. It is wonderful that even ourangoutangs and gorillas should feel the necessity of providing themselves with a place of refuge, while the Veddas don't trouble themselves about that in the least. They are afraid of elephants, and to avoid them they sometimes sleep on the tops of trees; otherwise the earth is their bed. They are not familiar with the culinary art. They eat their herbs raw. As for meat, they just throw it into the lire, and let it stay for a few minutes. No trace even of the cooking utensils of the stone age is to be found among them. Their favorite dish is monkey's flesh; besides which they also est roots seasoned with honey. Their sold domestic implements are their bows and arrows and exes ; the latter they never part with. Their mercantile transactions with the Cingalese are concluded in the following fashion: During the night they place before the door of a Cingalese blacksmith honey and dried meat (their only articles of export) and a model of the sort of axe they want. This model, which is made out of leaves or branches of trees, shows the exact size of the axe required. Shortly afterwards, but always at night time, they return for the axe, which the blacksmith is obliged to place in the very spot where he found the honey and meat. All this clearit shows their dread of open intercourse with the neighbouring tribes. It is hardy necessary to state that they have no family names. They say: the tall man, the short man, the big man, the little man, and so on so as to distinguish any particular person meant. They know nothing about numbers and counting. When they want to speak about a lot o people they keep on repeating one, one one, one. They, therefore, of course, don't know their own ages, nor understand the measurement of time or the dimensions of objects. On their seeing themselves in a looking glass, or hearing the report of firearms, for the first time, they behave exactly like monkeys do under similar circumstances. Religion they have none. and they believe neither in good nor evil spirits. They are about as much interested to understand the origin of things as gorillas, and oursing-outangs are. As for their souls and future state there is no trace of such words in their language. They show no fear of death, and do not even inter their corpses. When

Hokkel, however, asperts that the Veddan ere very chaste, and that monogemy is strictly adhered to. The crimes of adultery and hunting in that part of a forest siletted to another family are punished by death. Thefts and murder are unknown amongst ent families of Veddus.
